SUPREME COURT DAY PROBLEM

Frank Ashe, the owner of the Blue Dolphin tavern, seeks to overturn the suspension of his liquor license. The suspension was ordered based upon the sale of beer to a minor by one of Ashe's employees, who allegedly intended to harm Ashe to retaliate for the employee's impending discharge. The question in the case is whether Ashe should be held responsible for the acts of this employee under the Iowa statutes regulating the sale of alcoholic beverages and, if the statute so provides, whether the application of the statute under these circumstances violates constitutional principles of due process.

On April 11, 1991, as part of a sting operation, the Des Moines Police Department sent a 16-year-old confidential informant into Frank Ashe's establishment, the Blue Dolphin. Bartender Rick Winstock served the minor a beer without requesting any identification to confirm that the individual was of legal age. Subsequently, Winstock pled guilty to a charge of providing an alcoholic beverage to a minor in violation of Iowa Code § 123.49(2)(h).

To consider whether to suspend Ashe's liquor license based upon this incident, a hearing was held before the Iowa Departmental Hearing Board of the Iowa Department of Commerce, Alcoholic Beverages Division. At the hearing, Ashe contended that Winstock intentionally sold alcohol to the minor to retaliate against him, because Winstock had learned that he was shortly to be discharged. However, because the Board concluded that Ashe was responsible for the illegal sale in his tavern regardless of employee motivation, the Board made no finding that Winstock acted with intent. The Board ordered that the liquor license for Ashe's Blue Dolphin tavern be suspended for 30 days.

Frank Ashe filed a petition in Iowa District Court for judicial review of the license suspension. The district court interpreted the applicable statutes, Iowa Code §§ 123.49(h) and 123.50(3)(b), as requiring that an employer have control over the actions of his employees before being held responsible for their conduct. The court construed § 123.50(3) as not requiring "the employer to exert more care than what is reasonable to exact from one who assumed the responsibility of the licensee." Because the court believed Winstock had acted with malicious intent and thus outside of his employer's control, it ruled that it was not reasonable to expect Ashe to prevent the illegal sale. Moreover, the court stated, to hold otherwise would be a denial of the employer's right to due process. Accordingly, the district court reversed the suspension ordered by the Hearing Board.

The Hearing Board has appealed the district court's decision to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa.
