SUPREME COURT DAY PROBLEM

The three original shareholders of closely-held corporation agreed among themselves that the stock in the corporation could be transferred only to their children, intending to preserve ownership of the corporation in their lineal descendants. Accordingly, upon the death of one of the shareholders, the stock passed directly to her children, excluding her husband from any share. Her husband has filed this action challenging that result. The case raises complex questions of the permissibility of limitations on the transfer of property. The parties and the court must address the conflict between the idea that shareholders in a family corporation should be able to enter agreements among themselves keeping the ownership of the business within the family and the principle that property should be freely alienable (that is, transferable without limitation) to encourage the productive use of resources for the benefit of society.

PSW Cove Company was incorporated in 1985. The original shareholders of the corporation consisted of Kathryn White and her two children, Dianna Faulkner Hartman and Michael L. White. The corporation was a closely-held family business. The shareholders entered into a covenant among themselves, recorded in the bylaws of the corporation, that the stock in the corporation could only be transferred to the lineal descendants of Kathryn White. Upon the death of Kathryn White, her shares in the corporation were canceled and reissued to Dianna and Michael, pursuant to the stock transfer restrictions.

This dispute arose upon the death of Dianna Faulkner Hartman in 1989. She was survived by her husband, Patrick Hartman, and her three living children, Richard Faulkner, Joseph Faulkner, and Nancy Harper. Prior to her death, Dianna had executed a will which provided that the residue of her estate would be given to a trust. This trust would set aside a portion of her assets for the benefit of her children until they reached the age of thirty-five. The income from the balance of the assets in the trust would be used for the benefit of her husband, Patrick, until his death, when all the assets would pass to her children. However, subsequent to Dianna's death and pursuant to the stock restriction agreement, PSW Cove Company through its corporate secretary canceled Dianna's stock certificates and issued new certificates in the names of Dianna's children, Richard, Joseph, and Nancy. Thus, the shares of stock were not included in the probate of Dianna's estate nor were they included in the assets placed in the trust.

As a beneficiary of the trust, Dianna's surviving husband, Patrick Hartman, brought an action in Iowa state district court for a declaratory judgment to set aside the direct transfer of the PSW Cove Company stock to the three children. As the plaintiff, Patrick sought a declaration that the stock transfer restriction is an unreasonable restraint on alienation of property and thus is void as contrary to public policy. He also asked for a court ruling that the shares should be surrendered to the executor of Dianna's estate, whether or not the court finds the stock transfer restriction void. The defendant, PSW Cove Company, contended that the stock transfer restriction was a permissible vehicle by which to maintain ownership of the business within the family and that the effect of the restriction was to bypass the estate probate procedure. The district court ruled that the restraint on the transfer of shares of stock in PSW Cove Company is void and that the shares must be administered in probate to determine whether they should be distributed to the trust.

PSW Cove Company has appealed the district court's decision to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa.
