Tell us about yourself: what got you interested in LPS?

I had always suspected I wanted to be a lawyer and after speaking with the professors in the department I was completely sold. It was a mix of the professors, my fellow students, and the diverse courses that drew me in.

What have you been doing since you graduated?

I graduated from Drake University in 2022 and immediately moved to St. Louis to begin law school at Washington University. Throughout law school, I continued to have an LPS mindset by engaging in work related to educational justice, immigration, criminal prosecution, and serving as a judicial intern for a local judge. I am now employed as an associate at Dentons Davis Brown in Des Moines.

What do you like most about your current job?

It sounds cliché but it has to be the people. There's truth in the saying "you are who you surround yourself with." Working close to such driven, intelligent, and kind people really encourages me to be my best self. For instance, the level of community involvement: donating pro bono services, serving on boards of nonprofits, organizing for legal causes, inspired me to volunteer and participate in the Des Moines community.

What advice would you have for current students?

It will surprise you how far initiative can take you. If there is an issue that you care about, I can guarantee there are others out there working on the same cause who would be ecstatic to hear from you. I think LPS students can often feel dejected about these big issues, and don't know where to start.
